Brand Identity

Kaya

BRAND IDENTITY

Kaya is a sports goods brand that believes moving well and looking after yourself helps you live longer and better. The campaign line “Defy the clock” sums up that idea, and the stretched, fluid letters of the logo give the brand movement on posters, billboards and products.

Swell

BRAND IDENTITY

Swell is a concept for a yoga, pilates and spa studio. The founder is a psychologist from Glasgow who fell in love with the sea on family holidays in the Algarve and later trained as an instructor in Australia and Bali. The hand drawn logo, the wave symbol and the sea and sand colours bring that calm into the studio.

Sol & Sombra

VISUAL IDENTITY

Sol & Sombra is a café and snack bar with a sunny terrace. The name already existed, so the work was giving it a look as warm as the place. A sun rises next to the name, and the colours split it in two, gold for Sol and a darker brown for Sombra.

SOS Renovações

VISUAL IDENTITY

SOS Renovações is a renovation company in Bragança. The logo is based on a hex nut, the small part that keeps everything in place, and every O in the lettering became one. The result is a solid and simple brand that works on vans, workwear, site hoardings and phone screens.

VISUAL IDENTITY

inova is an accounting office run by Fátima Fernandes. The o in the name turns into a calculator, the tool every accountant uses, drawn with soft and rounded shapes. The blue to green gradient gives a sense of calm and growth.

Distortion

EDITORIAL DESIGN

Distortion is a rock magazine I made as a school project, built around the question “Is rock dead?”. It answers with two interviews, Slash and Damiano David from Måneskin, and both agree that rock is still alive, just no longer mainstream. The layout uses black and white photos, big condensed headlines and one red.

#THE INTERVIEW

SLASH'S TIMELY RECKONING

SLASH ON SURVIVAL, GRIT, AND WHY ROCK IS BUILT TO OUTLAST US ALL

WORDS BY JACK HARPER | INTERVIEW BY LEO SANTIAGO

The room is dim and honest. No polished glass, no soundscreen pas-de—just old amps humming gently and a Les Paul leaning against a beat-up Marshall. Slash sits low in a leather chair, legs outstretched, his sunglasses making him seem more statue than man. But once he starts talking, it's clear the fire is still there—quiet, but burning.

"You're with Distortion, right?" he says, voice gravelly. "Good. You guys still print what matters."

He flicks ash into an overflowing tray beside a lukewarm coffee. No handlers, no managers. This is the kind of listen-view that only happens when an artist chooses to speak. And when Slash talks, the room listens.

"People love saying 'rock is dead.' They've been saying that since before I picked up a guitar. But that's never been the point. Rock was never supposed to be alive in the way pop is. It's not meant to be safe or shiny. It's meant to bleed."

He shifts in his chair, eyes hidden behind the same shades that watched the Sunset Strip burn down and rebuild. "I've seen it all—the arenas, the overdoses, the bullshit. And I'm telling you: rock isn't dead. It's just underground again. Right where it started. Right where it thrives."

He pauses, takes a long drag, and lets the silence stretch.

> "If you think rock is gone, you're looking in the wrong places."

CATALOGUE COVER

Every year Grafpub publishes a catalogue of promotional products for its clients. For the 2027 edition I used a single image on the cover, a tote bag thrown into the sky with the year printed on it, as if it were the first product in the catalogue. The back cover lists all of Grafpub's services.

CATALOGUE COVER

The cover of the 2026 catalogue shows only one product, a pen with the word “Brindes” printed on it, held close to red lips. The year is set very large in white and cut off at the edge, closer to a fashion magazine than a product catalogue.

DIGITAL & CAMPAIGN

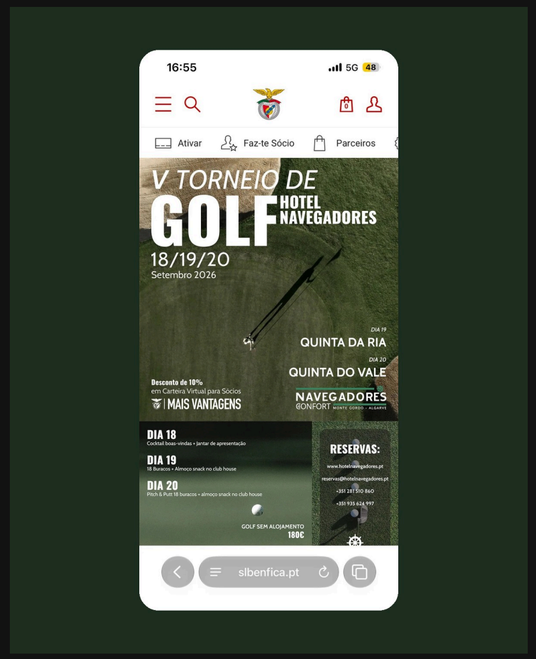

Hotel Navegadores, in Monte Gordo, organises a golf tournament every year. For the fifth edition the campaign ran mostly on the Benfica members' website as a partner offer. I chose images that show straight away what the event is about, with the name and dates in large condensed type.
